The Italian cinema of the 1960s and '70s was typified by sensational artistic directorial innovations. But there's an aspect that we tend to underestimate, the music.

Original soundtracks were able to create unique atmospheres and were the essential indispensable component of many movies made in Italy, for instance Sergio Leone's spaghetti westerns and the disturbing settings of Mario Bava's films.

Marco Cappelli, professor of classical guitar at the conservatory of Palermo [2], Francesco Cusa, drummer and composer, and Luca Lo Bianco, world famous jazz musician, are the members of an eclectic trio known as Italian Surf Academy. With their music they bring us back to the golden age of Italian cinematography by revisiting well known and illustrious themes, trying to rediscover these pieces with an original touch that makes everything unpredictable: improvisation.

trio began last year as a game", Neapolitan guitarist Marco Cappelli told us. "Surf music is a fundamental component for anyone who plays electric guitar and the project began with us playing covers of classic American songs, by bands like the Beach Boys. We thought of bringing our project to the United States focusing on the soundtracks of our own cinematic tradition, horrors, westerns and B movies" On March 18 the trio will perform at the Zebulon and those present will be brought back in time, accompanied by improvised performances by these exceptional artists on stage. Armando Trovajoli, Ennio Morricone and Piero Umiliani are just some of the composers revisited in the show's repertoire.
